Abstract

The South Dakota State Climate Office serves as the official source of climate and drought information for the state of South Dakota. The office provides climate data, analytical tools, outlooks, and related resources to support decision making in agriculture, industry, public safety, and other areas of public interest. Climate information is distributed through multiple platforms, including websites, social media, and print and electronic publications, providing public access to current and historical climate information.

The South Dakota State Climate Office Records document more than a century of weather and climate data collection across South Dakota and portions of Iowa, Minnesota, and Wyoming. The bulk of the collection consists of daily weather observation sheets submitted by volunteer reporting stations that record precipitation, air and soil temperature, wind, solar radiation, and related meteorological conditions. The scope and level of detail vary by station depending on available equipment. Materials are organized geographically by reporting location, including towns, research farms, and natural landmarks.

Additional materials include administrative and research records such as master's theses, grant proposals, legal case documentation involving weather data, radar output, storm and cloud photography, drought studies, and tree ring analysis. The collection also contains specialized reporting forms, including B-91 climatological reports, as well as documentation of significant weather events such as floods and droughts. The records document long term regional climate patterns and support research in environmental history, agriculture, climatology, and public safety.

Biography

The South Dakota State Climate Office serves as the official source of climate and drought information for the state. The office provides climate data, analytical tools, outlooks, and related resources to support informed decision-making across multiple sectors.

Its services are used by individuals and organizations involved in agriculture, industry, public safety, and other areas of public interest. Climate information and resources are distributed through a variety of platforms, including websites, social media, and print and electronic publications, ensuring broad public access to current climate information.

Scope and Content

The South Dakota State Climate Office Records document over a century of weather and climate data collection across South Dakota and parts of Iowa, Minnesota, and Wyoming. The bulk of the collection consists of daily weather observation sheets submitted by volunteer reporting stations, recording data such as precipitation, air and soil temperature, wind, and solar radiation. The detail and scope of observations vary based on the equipment available at each site. Materials are organized geographically by reporting location, including towns, research farms, and natural landmarks.

In addition to climatological data, the collection includes administrative and research materials such as master's theses, grant proposals, legal case documentation involving weather data, radar output, storm and cloud photography, and drought and tree ring analysis. Specialized forms, including B-91 climatological reports, are also present, along with materials relating to significant weather events such as flooding and droughts.

This collection offers insight into long-term regional climate trends. It is a valuable resource for environmental research, agricultural planning, legal reference, public safety, and historical climatology.
